In order to contribute to the progress of life science and the development of new therapies for diseases, the Department of Veterinary Medical Sciences conducts advanced research activities in relation to life phenomena and pathological conditions of animals, especially mammals. In addition, aiming at overcoming infectious diseases of animals as well as zoonotic infections, we engage in research that also contributes to improving public health. Further, our other significant role is to train students to be highly specialized experts who can take a lively part in this academic area in the world. By promoting these studies, we also aim to build a better relationship between animals and human beings and contribute to the health and welfare of both. This department offers only a four year Doctoral program. A Master's program is not available.
